

Russell Orlando

In my ceramic creations, I study subtle qualities in the material that have transpired during the making process. Shape, form and line embody my thinking as I work through the piece. Arrangement also becomes an important factor as I consider the final presentation. The objective here is find some kind of imperceptible truth in the relationships I form with the material and the environment I decide to activate.